

1990s and Beyond: Where Do You Stand?

Business & Government:

1. It is a business' right to choose to operate their business wherever they see fit, even if it means most of an American company's product production happens overseas.
2. The internet should run like a private business, based on the need for competition with little to no government interference (ex. no censorship of speech, access to certain websites or products determined by companies not govt., etc.)
3. The federal government should not place restrictions on gun ownership.
4. The private lives of politicians should be kept private and not impact how people see them or the job they do in politics.
5. I would not support a candidate for political office if I knew he/she had a number of sexual misconduct cases in their past.
6. It is good for America's economy & businesses if we encourage investment and trade with foreign nations.
7. Wealthy Americans should carry a higher tax burden than those who live in poverty.

8. Social Security is a flawed system. The federal government should allow private citizens to save what and how they like rather than requiring and investing in Social Security.

9. At this point, our national debt is really too big to really address. The government should continue to deficit spend as needed as opposed to cutting vital government services.

Social Issues:

10. Business owners should have the right to refuse services to a person based on their sexual orientation.

11. Openly gay & trans people should be allowed to serve in the military.

12. Politicians should directly interact with people through the media (rather than having the primary form of communication come through journalists writing stories on them or their own speeches.)

13. People should legally have the right to end their lives with the help of their doctor.

14. People should be able to control the gender & physical appearance of their children before conception.

15. If they feel threatened, police should be given the freedom to shoot first & ask questions later.
