The Voting Rights Act of 1965

Between 1964 and 1965 the state of Alabama, like many southern states at the time, prepared a complicated system of voter registration in order to prevent African-Americans from registering to vote. The primary source attached to this packet is one of the several registration forms used during this time. Between 1964 and 1965 there was not one test. In order to make it difficult for people to "study" for the test there were variations used in a random fashion. Between August 1964-July 1965 the state had 100 different tests and the applicant was to choose one at random from a binder.

Task:

Read over the attached Alabama voter registration document with a partner.

- FIRST: Place a "√" next to the questions you think ask for valid information a state would need to register
- SECOND: Make an "X" next to the questions you think are specifically designed to prevent people from registering to vote.

MOVIE NOTES: CNN's The Sixties: A Long March to Freedom

Election laws existed in nearly every southern state to state disenfranchise black voters. In Jan. 1965, activists began a campaign to get the right to vote in Selma.

1. Describe what happened in Selma, AL in 1965:
a. How would you characterize Sheriff Jim Clark?
b. What happened on Bloody Sunday?
What was significant about President Johnson's speech on the day the Voting Rights Act of 1965 was signed into law?
a. How did the new law help black voters?

The Voting Rights Act of 1965

By 1965, intensive efforts to break the grip of state efforts to restrict black voting had been under way for some time, but had achieved only modest success overall and in some areas had proved almost entirely ineffectual. The murder of voting-rights activists in Philadelphia, Mississippi, during Freedom Summer gained national attention, along with numerous other acts of violence and terrorism. Finally, the unprovoked attack on March 7, 1965, by state troopers on peaceful marchers crossing the Edmund Pettus Bridge in Selma, Alabama, en route to the state capitol in Montgomery, persuaded the President and Congress to overcome southern legislators' resistance to effective voting rights legislation. President Johnson issued a call for a strong voting rights law and hearings began soon thereafter on the bill that would become the Voting Rights Act.

Congress determined that the existing federal anti-discrimination laws were not sufficient to overcome the resistance by state officials to enforcement of the 15th Amendment. The legislative hearings showed that the Department of Justice's efforts to eliminate discriminatory election practices by litigation on a case-by-case basis had been unsuccessful in opening up the registration process; as soon as one discriminatory practice or procedure was proven to be unconstitutional and enjoined, a new one would be substituted in its place and litigation would have to commence anew.

President Johnson signed the Voting Rights Act into law on August 6, 1965.

- Section 2 of the Act applied a nationwide prohibition against the denial or abridgment of the right to vote on the basis of literacy tests.
- The Act contained special enforcement provisions targeted at those areas of the country where Congress believed the potential for discrimination to be the greatest.
 - O Under Section 5, jurisdictions covered by these special provisions could not implement any change affecting voting until the Attorney General or the United States District Court determined that the change did not have a discriminatory purpose and would not have a discriminatory effect.
- In addition, the Attorney General could appoint a federal examiner to review the qualifications of persons who wanted to register to vote. In those counties where a federal examiner was serving, the Attorney General could request that federal observers monitor activities within the county's polling place.

In your own words, what did the Voting Rights Act do to protect the voting rights of all citizens?
